Solving conflicts across borders - how does international mediation work?

"In the age of globalization, the world is growing ever closer together. This also applies to mediation. The need for mediators who are trained in international dispute resolution is growing steadily. With our training we prepare them in the best possible way for their demanding task," - Prof. Dr. Gernot Barth, Head of IKOME | Steinbeis Mediation.

As borders become more permeable than ever before, people move and build their lives across them. Conflicts related to work or family thus won't stop at borders either, bringing with them implications for the practise of mediation and conflict resolution. Different legal systems, varying standards and diverse cultural perspectives are all of relevance and need to be taken into account by mediation practitioners.

What does it take to conduct mediation in an international and/or intercultural setting?

In order to mediate cross-border or intercultural conflicts, you do not only need profound mediation skills and experience. It is also important to understand the cultural differences of the involved parties and how these cultural specifics influence communication, conflict understanding and conflict escalation. Moreover, international mediators require knowledge about legal issues within national and transnational frameworks. They have to be able to establish an empathetic and trusting relationship to all parties of the conflict and be aware of their own task and attitude.

That said, you have to take into consideration, that mediation and the role of a mediator are understood differently in different parts of the world, too – which again has an impact on the mediator's work.

In our training course you will acquire all competences to master the challenges of international mediation and conduct international and intercultural cases successfully. The focus of the practice-oriented training is on teaching methods of intercultural conflict management and mediation, intercultural communication, intervention techniques and special aspects of cross-border conflicts using example cases. Cognitive contents are presented in connection with practical problems (cases). Our interdisciplinary training also promotes the communicative and interactive competence of the participants, who have different cultural backgrounds themselves. You will be enabled to deal with intercultural conflicts constructively.

Further focus is given to Online Dispute Resolution (ODR), negotiation as well as knowledge concerning the necessary (international) legal frameworks.

The training is delivered online by expert international trainers and consultants in English. It consists of a basic part with live seminars, nine e-learning units for self-learning, three in-depth workshops and a final exam with case simulations.

How does our qualification course help you to enhance your career?

A specialization in international mediation is becoming more and more indispensable for mediators working in the business, family or public sector and being confronted with intercultural issues in their cases. The qualification is also of high value for conflict resolution in civic participation projects or for mediating conflicts in the neighbourhood or between tenants when different cultural backgrounds are playing a role.

Graduates of our course will be enabled to mediate conflicts:

- between companies in different countries
- within international companies
- in teams with different cultural backgrounds

- in bi-national families
- between customers and companies in different countries
- in communities with different cultural backgrounds
- between companies or public bodies and communities when intercultural issues are at stake

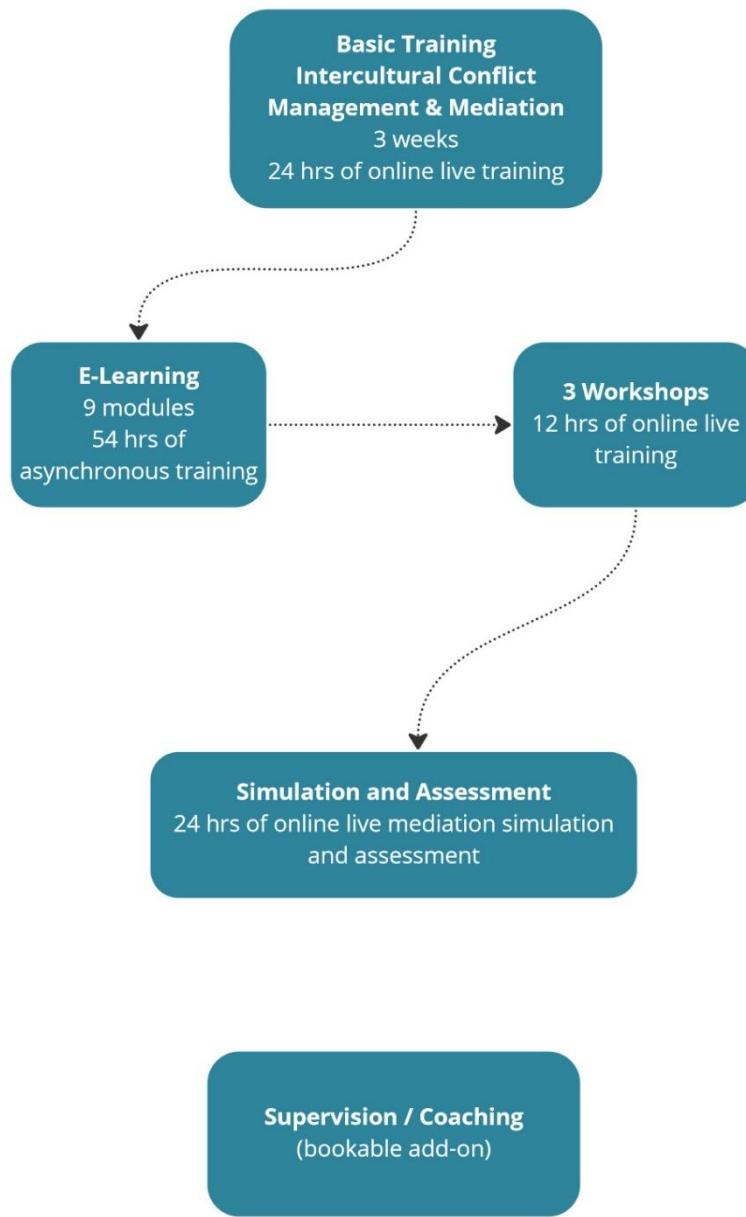

... to name only a few examples.

Whether you plan to fully dedicate your mediation career to international cases, or you want to add intercultural cases to your national portfolio, or even use part of the qualification for your consulting or training activities, our International Mediation Training Course allows you to do it all.

Importantly, our training course is targeted at mediation professionals, meaning that a previous training in mediation practices is required when wanting to gain a deeper insight into the intercultural processes at the core of international mediation.

Training Content

Our training course combines synchronous and asynchronous learning modules. Each module is focusing on a specific content. However, content which has already been learned is also repeated and meaningfully linked to new aspects. Role plays, practical cases, exercises and analytical feedback support the transfer of knowledge into practice. Thus, a continuous increase in competence of the trainees is ensured. Trainees are provided with access to an e-learning platform.
